One of the biggest problems a traveler can have is wear to rest after landing from a flight. As a solution, airport operators have opened micro hotels where guests can get a short shut eye before moving on to another flight or while waiting for people to fetch them. This concept is based on the concept of the Japanese which is the “capsule hotel”. The cabins in these micro hotels are small and travelers will literally sleep in a box. However, despite the size of these cabins, the rooms are comfortable and everyone will get their well deserved rest.
Over the past few years, many places have adopted the idea. From London to Moscow and even Philadelphia and Dubai, micro hotels are a great investment. Airport terminals are the most ideal locations. Here are some of the best micro hotels which have proven that size does has nothing to do with value.
